2. Circumstances of breach

Nature of breach (including links with previous breaches, if any)

The National Statistics release 'Police Service Strength, England and Wales, 30 September 2012' was intended for release by Home Office Statistics on Thursday 31 January 2013 but did not appear on the Home Office's website at the pre-announced time of 9.30am. Publication was delayed until 11.50am. The issue was immediately spotted, and every effort was made to expedite publication.

Reasons for breach

Technical issues relating to publishing on the Home Office website, which prevented all new pages being published over this period.

3. Reactions and impact (both within the producer body and outside)

While there was a delay in publication, the 'Police Service Strength' release was being anticipated by media and other data users and had been previously released under embargo according to arrangements for pre-release access. For example the Association of Chief Police Officers, one of the recipients, commented on the Police Strength release on their website. Given Business Questions in the House that morning where the figures were likely to be asked about following the previous day's announcement on future police recruitment, and notification that the BBC was planning to report on the figures, David Blunt took the decision to release the final publication, by email, to the data users on our pre-release access list (noting the technical difficulties). Press officers also agreed to make the document available to home affairs correspondents on request.

4. Corrective actions taken to prevent reoccurrence of such a breach (include short-term actions, and long-term changes made to procedures)

Whilst the failure of the Home Office website was being investigated, plans were made to load the report onto the ONS website as a contingency. Communications Directorate in the Home Office are doing all they can to ensure this does not occur again. From 24 March, all Home Office web content will be assured by the Cabinet Office, who are managing GOV.UK (the website to which all Home Office content will migrate).

5. Links to published statements about this breach
