Guide for Community Buying Groups

About this guide

This guide gives you practical information and advice on how to set up and run a community buying group. It is primarily intended for groups of consumers operating on a not-for-profit basis.

There are many benefits to joining together with other consumers and combining your buying power to get better deals from shops and other suppliers. By buying in bulk, you can get discounts on prices, saving money. There are other benefits too. Examples of things that groups buy together are food, household goods and heating oil.

About us

This guide was produced by the Consumer and Competition Policy Directorate of the Department of Business, Innovation and Skills (BIS).

The guide includes links to websites or references to material made available by other organisations, where further guidance can be found. In particular, some information is taken from the Food Co-ops Toolkit which was produced by Sustain, as part of the Making Local Food Work project. BIS is very grateful for the assistance of these organisations and others who contributed to the production of the guide. BIS is not responsible for material provided in non-UK Government websites or other publications.

The guidance, including legal guidance, in this guide can only be very general. It is intended to make you aware of some key issues that can arise in setting up and running a group, and where to find further help. Depending on what your group plans to do, you may need to get advice on your particular circumstances.
What are the advantages of buying as a group?

It’s good for your pocket

By pooling your orders with others, you can buy in bulk, and as the costs to shops or suppliers can be lower if there is a group of buyers you may benefit from significant discounts.

Some people find it difficult to get to supermarkets or other shops which tend to have the cheapest prices. They may also struggle with online shopping, they may not have a computer or might be put off by delivery costs. Joining forces means you can find more convenient ways to get what you need, and can share the costs.

Some groups order directly from suppliers, rather than buying in shops, cutting out the middleman. This can mean further savings.

Some things are more complicated than others to buy. Getting the best deal can be harder work in some cases than in others. For example, when buying heating oil, prices change very frequently. The group coordinator can watch the market and buy at the right time. In renewable energy schemes, finding the right supplier takes some time and effort but by buying as a group, you have more skills and knowledge between you.

It’s good for the environment

Group buying can reduce the number of deliveries needed, particularly important for products such as heating oil, which requires large tankers. Buying from local suppliers can cut down on carbon footprints. Some groups are set up to provide local and organic produce.

It’s good for the community

Group buying can bring people together which may lead on to other activities that benefit communities. It can be a way for you to meet up with friends and make new friends with people you might otherwise not come across.

It’s good for learning new skills

Volunteering in a buying group can be a way of getting new skills and experience, and developing confidence. For example: being able to speak in front of a group, working in a team to solve problems and developing computer, business and marketing skills.
CASE STUDIES

R Shop Bulk Buying Project

The idea

The R Shop Bulk Buying Project started in 2009, with the support of the Social Innovation Lab Kent (SILK), part of Kent County Council. Since 2007, the SILK team had been working on the Parkwood Estate, where many families were living on a very tight budget. The residents identified problems with shopping. Problems included the cost of bus fares to the supermarket a few miles away; getting bulky items home on the bus; difficulties storing shopping at home; lack of access to computers, and the charge made for delivery by most supermarkets. Local shops could be more expensive than the supermarket and didn’t have as large a range of goods or product sizes. One resident suggested a shop to bring bulky goods to the community to make life easier and less expensive and to bring the community together.

How it happened

An initial meeting for residents, public services and the voluntary and community sector developed the idea. A core team researched people’s existing shopping habits and what they would want to buy. They promoted the group, for example, setting up a ‘Parkwood Bulk Buy’ Facebook page, as many residents already used Facebook. The core team tested out the idea, for example, doing test runs to suppliers and selling items at community events. Initially the core team consisted of residents and staff from local public services, but as time went on, it has become solely made up of residents. The head teacher at a local school let them turn a disused kitchen into a community room for the group.

The group took two years to develop. Its shop sells items such as baby wipes, washing powder and nappies. A comparison of a shopping basket of five items with a supermarket price comparison site showed savings of up to 29 per cent on individual items (plus savings on bus fares). It is also easier for people to walk somewhere close to home to collect their purchases. The shop, which is open two days a week, is non-profit making, although it takes a small margin in order to restock. The group doesn't pay rent, as the school got the room, which it can also use, refurbished at no cost.

A problem faced by the group was that it didn't fit into any existing model. As it wasn't a conventional business, it was difficult to get a business card to buy stock at a cash and carry. They arranged with a local shopkeeper to make purchases on behalf of the group. Now they buy from supermarkets which are running special offers, and stockpile the goods – though sometimes supermarkets limit the number of bulk buy or special offer products that it's possible to buy. The group has a written constitution as this allows them to get funding. The local Healthy Living Centre opened a bank account on behalf of the group. People place orders via the Facebook forum, or pop into the shop.

Substantial funding was received for the group from the Local Authority Poverty Innovation Pilot, funded by the Department for Education. The funding was spent on refurbishing the community room, promotion and marketing, buying stock, providing training and driving lessons, and buying computers, printers and mobile phones. However, the SILK team thinks that the project could be replicated without this level of funding. They point out that residents were reluctant to spend all the money and got local businesses to donate goods. They recommend that the community should map and tap into existing resources and skills.

The benefits

The SILK team emphasise that the group is not just about saving money or convenience. Residents on the core team feel that it has improved friendships and social and community life. They have improved their skills, including IT and business skills. While only four families are on the core team, the group has made a difference to the wider community, which can also buy in the shop. The community room can be hired out for other community activities. And as a spin-off, a Time Bank scheme allowing people to earn credits for time spent volunteering – including volunteering in the shop – has been set up. Credits can be spent in the shop.
Tips:

- Don’t build expectations too high, for example, about how much savings will be.

- Keep trying different things. If it doesn’t work, it isn’t a failure, try something else.

- Be open to other people joining in

- If the group is led by residents rather than public services, it is more likely to meet the community’s needs and to be sustainable. Services need to facilitate people to do things by themselves.

Solar 100 Project

This buying group enabled local residents to purchase solar panels for their properties at a reduced price. Solar panels can generate household electricity or hot water, reducing energy bills for households and reducing carbon emissions.

The idea

The initial idea was the brainchild of two close friends wanting to make their own personal contribution to climate change. After getting together with others in the community and setting up Transition Town Marlow (TTM) in 2009, the idea of setting up a solar panel buying group soon became a reality.

The project began in March 2010 and by the end of the project in March 2011 twenty-three households had signed up to the group and had solar panels installed.

The benefits

Understanding how solar panels work can be tricky and their installation is also quite costly. Working together as a group gave the founding members of TTM the power to thoroughly research the technology involved, the installers of solar panels and other associated organisations, in order to negotiate the best service, product and price. In addition to the discounts made purchasing as a large group, users of solar panels are paid by the government for generating electricity using renewable, low carbon energy (a scheme known as feed-in tariffs – currently under Government review). The Group was also part of a scheme operated by Good Energy, which pays each household for every unit of heat energy it produces.

The amount of time it takes to recover the cost of installing solar panels is around 10 years. This is based loosely on the Government feed-in tariffs, the free electricity the panel provides and the money obtained from exporting excess electricity to the network. Due to the discount negotiated with their chosen installer and payments received from Good Energy, this period is likely to be reduced further for householders that purchased panels through the group.
The knowledge and expertise developed by the founding members of the group has also allowed them to share their experience with others, encouraging people to make a more effective contribution to reducing their CO₂ emissions.

How does it work?

People were able to register their interest in the group by email or online. Details of households ready to have their property surveyed were then forwarded to the buying group’s chosen installer who would then contact the householder directly and organises a free survey. The contract was between the householder and installation company, who was paid in instalments, with the final 50 per cent paid when the system was up and running. The householders subsequently received their discount as a series of rebates based on a sliding scale of discounts that was dependent on how many households sign up to the group. The group was ultimately able to secure a discount of 15 per cent off the installer’s best prices.

Working in partnership with local businesses

The group partnered with Good Energy, an independent, ethical, renewable energy provider, based in Wiltshire. Good Energy helped run and promote the project. The group also partnered with Freesource Energy, a specialist installer of renewable energy products also based in Wiltshire.

The feed-in tariff scheme is currently under review. The estimate of how long it takes to recover the cost of installing panels is likely to change as a result of the review. Further information can be found at www.decc.gov.uk.

Up2Us – Buying activities and services together

Pilot projects in Oxfordshire and Knowsley have developed local social networking websites for people who use social care, to enable them to find others with similar interests in order to buy activities and services together. So, for example, if two people wanted to play badminton together they could share the costs of renting a court. The community portals are also a forum for providers to develop new services together with users.

The community portals are part of a project to test out collective purchasing in social care. The project managers in the two areas both wanted to find a way to link up people with similar interests. Julia Brett, the project manager in Oxfordshire says: ‘We spoke to lots of service users about collective purchasing. Everyone thought it was great. ‘The problem is that we can’t find people who’ve got a shared interest. That’s how the idea of a community portal came about’.

Pilot funding (£7000 for each area) paid for CDSM Interactive to develop its software, People and Places, for the community portal. CDSM Interactive has been developing the online community networking tool for the past 5 years. The company specialises in developing software that is accessible, usable, safe and secure. The initial idea was that the software could be used by people with learning disabilities, although it also has general applicability. The site focuses on bringing people together online and connecting people to actively do things together in their own local community. People and Places offers a safe and secure alternative to other social networking sites, such as Facebook. It provides a practical way for people to come together on-line and off-line to make choices about purchasing services in ways that have never been done before. There are safeguards built into the system for people who need them. For example, users are buddy up’d with other members who can help them make choices in their use of the site.

In Oxfordshire, a group of service users with learning disabilities, Up2Us champions, had a central role in making decisions about what was included in the portal and how it looked. The website, which is open to the general public, has about 100 users. ‘It’s not just for people with a learning disability or those with a social care budget but for everybody in the community. It aims to enable people to have more choice and control, to be linked through their interests, reduce isolation and promote well-being by doing things that really make a difference to having a fulfilling life’ says Julia Brett. The Knowsley project, which started six months later than the Oxfordshire project, is less advanced. It is used by people getting social care and currently has 40 users.

The two project managers have thought about how to make the portals accessible to people who wouldn’t normally use computers. In Oxfordshire, people meet in an internet café and libraries with computers, and some service providers have communal computers. Julia Brett also suggests that people could collectively purchase a computer. They also provide training to get on-line and safety on-line. The project manager in Knowsley, Ursula Rigert, hopes to get funding to buy laptops for people without a computer.

The schemes are part of a project to test out collective purchasing amongst people who get a Personal Budget to pay for social care. The pilot projects, a total of six, are being run by the Housing Action Charity, HACT. With Personal Budgets, the local authority pays cash to people who need social care and support. They can choose to buy some or all services themselves, rather than the local authorities providing them.

Personal Budgets are intended to put people in control and allow them to choose the support that suits them best. However, there were concerns that people might, in practice, find it difficult to have a significant impact on the development of services. In addition, if people are buying services individually, economies of scale would be lost. The pilots are intended to test whether collective purchasing can be a way of putting people in control and keeping some economies of scale.

The Up2Us pilot in Oxfordshire has come to an end. While additional funding is keeping the portal going, Julia Brett is looking to develop a financially sustainable model for the long term. Her vision is to have 5,000 users, and to finance it by charging service providers for advertising on the portal. One of the champions made a successful pitch at a Dragons Den event run by SITRA, an organisation which provides leadership in the housing, social and care sector. She won three-quarters of the money (sadly, the money was fake…).

In another development in the Knowsley pilot, three tenants at an Extra Care Accommodation Scheme have bought gym equipment between them which they could not have afforded as individuals. Although they could go to a gym, they wanted to use the equipment in the evenings and as a hub for socialising. Ursula Rigert led the project, and the tenants selected the equipment. They also came up with the idea of inviting other tenants to use it and charging them. It was agreed that income from the membership fees would be used for maintenance and buying additional equipment.

There have been a lot of issues to deal with. For example, health and safety concerns and legal questions about whom the equipment belonged to and what would happen if one of the tenants left. The tenants formed an unincorporated association and participated in drawing up an agreement to cover these points. However, Ursula Rigert is hoping that it will be possible to start use very shortly. Her experience is that, while professionals see the benefits of collective purchasing, but also the obstacles, service users are immediately very enthusiastic.

The Up2Us pilot is funded by HACT, the Department of Health and Communities and Local Government. The Richmond Fellowship is match funding the Knowsley Up2Us project.

Nef (the New Economics Foundation) is evaluating the pilots. The evaluation asks two key questions:

- Does collective purchasing have a positive impact on the lives of people with Personal Budgets?
- Does collective purchasing enable people to use budgets in a way that influences the provider market and future provision, and create benefits for its members and the wider community?

Early findings have shown that collective purchasing is largely being used to fund social activities, as service users thought this was important to make a difference to their lives. It is hoped, though, to extend collective purchasing further, to other services and to accommodation.

Allen Valleys Oil Buying Co-operative

The AV Oil Buying Co-operative is a local fuel oil buying group located in the south of Northumberland. It was set up in the summer of 2011. The group already has 112 members which include local residents, businesses and organisations in the local community. The group focuses on purchasing heating oil (kerosene) (generally used domestically to heat homes), red diesel (also used for agricultural and industrial purposes as well as a home heating oil) and white diesel (generally used in every day road vehicles).

The idea

Rocketing fuel prices and the fuel poverty it generates for more and more users of fuel oil prompted Sustainable Allendale, an existing community “think tank”, to consider the set up of an oil buying group. Research into the creation of the group revealed a good opportunity to address these issues.

How does the group work?

Those wanting to join the group can register their interest by email, phone or in person, at a specified time, at the local village hall. Each month the group administrator, Lauren Langton, contacts its members specifying when an order needs to be made by. Members are free to make a purchase as and when fuel is needed and are not tied in each month. Each purchasing member specifies the amount of fuel they require and the administrator calculates the total amount of fuel ordered for that month. Various suppliers are then contacted in order to obtain the best price. Suppliers can vary each month. Details of the group members that have made an order are passed to the chosen supplier and the members are told which supplier has been chosen and the price that has been negotiated. The member is then contacted directly by the oil supplier to arrange delivery and payment. Selling to a group in the local community means the oil supplier is able to take the most effective and cost efficient route when delivering the oil. After the delivery has been arranged, a full update is sent to all members via email together with updated notices in newsletter and posters.

Communication between the group and its members takes place via email. Members who do not have access to a computer are able to contact the administrator in the first week of the month they wish to order oil.

The benefits

The creation of the group has proven to have many benefits, for example:

- The more oil that can be bought in one go the more the cost comes down per litre, so buying oil collaboratively means cheaper oil for all those buying through the group. Typically a member saves 3 pence per litre, that’s a £30 saving for a 1,000 litre order.
• The ability to buy in bulk through the group also means members can buy oil at the same discounted price regardless of how much fuel they personally order. This is particularly beneficial for those members who are not in a financial position to order in large quantities so that they can get fuel at a lower price. It is one way of tackling the increasing fuel poverty caused by volatile fuel prices.

• Buying from the groups takes away the hassle of contacting a variety of suppliers, monitoring prices and ensuring oil is ordered when demand is low so that the best price is obtained. This can all be left to the group administrator.

• The creation of such a community initiative helps promote community spirit, creating goodwill and a feeling of local empowerment.

• Buying as a group means fewer deliveries being made by large oil tankers, this means lower CO2 emissions, less fuel being used up to deliver oil and in turn benefits the environment.

_Tip:_

To maintain your bargaining power and make the most of fluctuating oil prices don’t tie your group in with one supplier. Always leave your group room to shop around.

Oxfordshire Rural Community Council
– Oil Bulk Buying Scheme

Oxfordshire Rural Community Council (ORCC) is running a large-scale consortium of heating oil clubs across the county and has now expanded, within the first year, to cover 19 other counties.

In Oxfordshire alone, the scheme covers 48 communities, covered by 30 volunteer co-ordinators. There are already over 500 members. Members generally save about £45 on a 1,000 litre delivery, a saving of towards ten per cent.

After chief executive Linda Watson launched the scheme, it became obvious to her that the business model would work not just in Oxfordshire but in other counties as well. Only three months after the launch, she spoke at a conference of other RCC Chief Executives and found a willing and enthusiastic audience. She has franchised the business model and it is rapidly rolling out across England.

ORCC, a charity is delivering the scheme through a trading arm, ORCC Trading Ltd. Community Buying UnLimited, a company run by Chris Pomfret, is an important part of the business model, negotiating on behalf of all customers to get the best value deals. Participating counties pay Community Buying unLimited a fee for undertaking the negotiations. Chris Pomfret says: “For the most vulnerable and isolated people, the savings can be as high as 20-25 per cent. This is because they generally buy smaller amounts and may be on less favourable payment schemes.” Members of the scheme pay a £20 annual membership fee.

Linda Watson says: “We are looking at other products – the longer game being to get the environmental/renewables message out there. Meanwhile, we have acted quickly to offer bulk-bought bags of rock salt to households, via Parish Councils. Although that scheme is only two weeks old, Chris is already getting better prices. Again, we know this can be rolled out far more widely than just Oxfordshire.”

“At the heart of the business model is the fact that we have rooted it through our local links in communities. Our co-ordinators are enthusiastic and although some are working full time and are already busy people, they are spreading the word and the membership is rising steadily. It is the credibility given by the recommendations of friends and neighbours that gives us such strength – and we know that will work in our favour when we move to further develop the concept.”
The 500th buyer to be signed up in Oxfordshire said: “Recently we heard of a fellow villager paying 77p per litre from their regular supplier and on the Bulk Oil Scheme we have just been quoted 54.55p per litre. It really speaks for itself.”
What is it?

The Partnership runs seven food cooperatives, three in the north and four in the south in the borough of Sefton, Merseyside. The Partnership started as a result of a prompt from the local Primary Care Trust (PCT). There were concerns about healthy eating, including access to affordable fruit and vegetables. The PCT decided to fund the Brighter Living Partnership to provide fruit and vegetables cooperatives in the north (Southport and Formby) of the borough. Latterly, this expanded into the south of the borough, possibly more deprived than the north. There are about 175 regular customers, as well as a lot of drop-in customers, particularly in the south.

The Co-ops in the north have been going for about 4 years, those in the south for about 6 months.

Originally the food coops were run by the Womens’ Royal Voluntary Service (WRVS). As they were unable to continue, they asked the Partnership to take over. Some of the groundwork had already been done, in recruiting volunteers for example. Membership was built up through dealings with private, public and voluntary sector partner organisations, totalling 80-90 bodies.

In addition to the role of promoting a healthier lifestyle, the Partnership attaches great importance to its social inclusion activities, for example it runs allotments aimed at people suffering from depression to ensure that they are doing some type of activity.

A lot of the goods are locally produced. Farm shops are used occasionally or sometimes any outlet where an item can be obtained cheaply. The Partnership is looking to find premises to store goods – a shop front for example – so as not to be reliant on daily deliveries. It should then be possible to reduce prices even more, so that customers would pay significantly less than they would at a supermarket

The Partnership is registered as a charity, which comes under the umbrella of the local Council for Voluntary Service (CVS). The CVS provides resources including finance and HR. The CVS also provides a lot of help/advice on setting up constitutions, forming companies, etc for small organisations.

How it works

The Partnership comprises four paid staff and around 40 volunteers. Most of the volunteers are older. It was not easy to recruit volunteers from deprived areas. The Partnership saw volunteering as a step between being unemployed and going into a work environment. This transition can be an enormous jump for some people.

Being a charity, making money is not of primary concern, but any small profit made is automatically ploughed back into the business, to cover things like running a delivery van, buying bags (for packing), publicity, etc.

Given the scale of the Partnership’s operations, it would struggle to survive without employing paid staff. The staff focus on things like buying from wholesale, sorting out invoices, etc. There is also the logistics of ensuring there is no wastage and delivering to several locations.

The Partnership deals directly with the supplier if there are issues of quality or trust. Customer feedback surveys are undertaken.

Volunteers are funded to go on food-handling hygiene courses, health and safety awareness courses, etc. Specific courses can sometimes also be sponsored. Volunteers are also Criminals Record Bureau (CRB) checked. There are peer mentor training courses, which can lead to a national qualification and placement through partner organisations.

Paid employees make the deliveries to the co-ops and individuals. Volunteers sell the produce and collect the money. The person who has responsibility for running the co-op does the banking.

The Partnership has a Constitution in place, which includes arrangements for volunteers. An audit trail for money is in place.

Bureaucracy and legal issues are dealt with by the CVS, but the Partnership is able to deal with some. For a smaller organisation it might not be so easy.
The Partnership is covered by public liability insurance. The delivery van is insured and so are individual members. It is not cheap, but it is important for the Partnership to provide a service. It also pays insurance on the property it occupies.

Money matters

The monthly spend on supplies is around £2,500. The Partnership is invoiced daily and pays suppliers monthly.

The Partnership finds it helpful that accounts are the responsibility of the CVS employees, which makes it easier to focus on other things. Most of the records are done manually, but electronic records are done by Nicky Speakman and Matthew Smith of the Partnership.

Quarterly reviews are held with the PCT on how any money is used. However, there is a good trusting relationship and the assumption is that any money would be used wisely. There is NHS funding of £10,000 yearly – to set up new co-ops in the south.

The facility to buy online and to pay using PayPal is available – but this is not used a lot. Generally 2/3 orders a week are done using this method. This method is more likely to be used by people in less deprived areas. The system is primarily cash-based. Cheques are accepted, as are food vouchers – see image below. The PCT gives out vouchers in certain cases, e.g. low income groups, which are sometimes distributed through chemists.

!Image of a fruit and vegetable voucher

People tend to pre-order the same items, so it’s easier to keep a track of requirements.

Marketing

Publicity is done through the internet, leaflets to new customers, word of mouth, occasional press releases, advertising through partner organisations and Facebook pages. The Partnership also attends different events, including open days at schools. Orders are taken through children's centres in the area. Newsletters are also sent to the partners. Additionally, registration forms are collected as part of the arrangement with the PCT. People decide if they want to receive any marketing material. This method would advertise any services in the area; for example, no smoking week.
In the north, care homes for older people were targeted, taking mainly fruit and some vegetables, as the residents did not have access to local shops. Sheltered accommodation was also targeted.

The Partnership has been working with housing associations to explore new markets, but more time and resources would be needed to do this. It will be working with One Vision housing in the future but would like to develop work with SMEs dropping off fruit baskets. This will need a marketing campaign.

- Know the people
- Know the product
Checklist for setting up a community buying group

✓ Can I find other people who might share my interest in buying things as a group?

✓ What can we buy better as a group than we could as individuals (it would be cheaper or more convenient, or we could pool our knowledge about how to buy it)?

✓ Have we worked out if there are enough people to buy what we want to buy, at at least the price we can buy it for?

✓ Have we thought about why people will buy through or from us and not from the competition?

✓ Have we worked out what resources we need (premises, people, money, equipment)?

✓ Have we considered how we can find these resources? Could we get things for free or low cost?

✓ Have we worked out what all our costs are going to be?

✓ Have we found out what kind of advice and support may be available to help us?

✓ Have we found suppliers for what we want to buy?

✓ Have we produced a plan which shows if our idea has a strong chance of success?

✓ Have we decided how we want the group to operate? Do we need to decide on formal roles and ways of working? Do we need a legal structure?

✓ How are we going to market and promote what we are doing? Have we identified our customers and how we are going to reach them?

✓ Have we worked out how the group will handle money matters? Do we need a bank account?

✓ Have we investigated how the law might affect our group (especially if it’s running on lines that are more like a business)?
How do we get started?

If you are interested in setting up a community buying group, one of the first steps is to find out if others share this interest and who would be prepared to join together with you. There are a number of ways of doing this:

- Speak to neighbours and friends.
- Make contact with community organisations, clubs, societies, church groups, parent and toddler groups, parish councils etc.
- If you are already in a group of some kind, this could be a good place to start. For example, colleagues who work with you or other parents at your child’s school.
- Advertise locally via parish magazines, local websites.
- Use social media networks such as Facebook and Twitter.

You may want to gauge interest by arranging a meeting, for example, at someone's home or a room in a community centre or village hall. You can put forward initial ideas about what the benefits of forming a group would be, and ask for reactions and suggestions. What would people like to consider buying together? And what aspect do they want to focus on: convenience, price, service, quality? Would people be willing to volunteer?

It's a good idea to get someone to record the key points of the meeting, including names and contact details of those attending. People can also be asked if they have any particular skills or experience to offer, for example, computer and IT skills, managing finances, promotion and marketing etc.

Rather than set up your own group, you may want to join an existing one, if there is one in your area. This will save you time, although setting up your own group means you can make it work exactly as you want. To find out about heating oil groups and food co-operatives, see: www.sustainweb.org/foodcoopstoolkit and www.citizensadvice.org.uk/oilclubs/oilclubs-info.htm
You might already belong to a craft club, allotment group, reading group, knitting and sewing circles, or amateur arts or dramatic society. Many of these groups benefit financially by buying their resources and materials collectively.

Your local support and development organisation for voluntary and community groups can provide people, support and resources to help get your initiative going.

So what are the next steps?

The group needs to make some key decisions at the outset.

- Do you want a formal system of members? If so, should anyone be able to join or should it be restricted to specific sections of the community (for example, parents at a school, or people living in a particular area)? The larger the group, the more likelihood there is of achieving savings, but the very size could prove unwieldy. Conversely, a smaller group is easier to manage, but its purchasing power will be smaller too.

- What is the best way to communicate with each other e.g. email, phone call, texting?

- Do you want to charge a fee to join the group to help cover costs? Be careful not to set it so high that it could put people off joining (you could offer people free membership in some circumstances).

- Should any members be allowed to get any personal financial benefit (for example, should they be compensated for the time they spend organising things?). This may help your group to be sustainable in the longer term. It is important that any personal financial benefit is agreed and that the rest of the group knows about it from the start. Equally, if your group agrees that they don’t want anyone to benefit in this way, it should be made clear to members.

Do you just want to sell to your members only or to the public more widely? You will need to think about this when planning your project. You might want to offer your members bigger discounts to encourage them to join.

Some groups may not want a formal committee or the paperwork involved with formal meetings. But it can be an advantage to have clear roles for different people, such as who is going to be responsible for chairing meetings, keeping records of key decisions, managing finances, recruiting members and keeping records of their contact details.
It's a good idea to consider, particularly if your group gets bigger, whether you want to make your purpose, structure and rules more formal. (See How do we organise our group?).
How do we plan our project?

It is important to decide what the goals for your group are; consider whether it’s feasible to achieve them, investigate different options for making it work and plan how you are going to put your project into effect. The key questions to consider are:

- What need or demand is there for what you want to bulk buy?
- What should the group buy and how much?
- Who should the group buy from?
- If you are planning to buy and sell on, how are you going to sell what you’ve bought?

One of the first things to consider is whether people are likely to buy through your group and, if so, how many? What do they want and need? And will your group suit their needs? A large number of people need to want or need something similar, for you to buy in bulk and save money. It’s important to find out if retailers are already supplying what you plan to sell at a price or quality or convenience that you can’t improve on.

This means consulting people or doing some market research. You will need to speak to people who would be your customers to find out if they want and would use the group.

There are lots of ways to do this. It doesn't have to involve a lot of time or any money. It could be done through informal conversations with friends and neighbours, a questionnaire, holding a public meeting or focus group, or using online forums.

It's a good idea to do more thorough and systematic market research if your project is large scale and ambitious (and this may cost some money). And if you want to apply for funding for your group, you may need the results of market research to show convincingly that the group would work and would benefit people. You may be able to raise some funds to pay for market research (for example, to pay for a trained facilitator to run a consultation event or focus group). (See Raising money).

The kind of questions you need to ask people will depend on the focus of your group but are likely to include:

- Do you have any problems buying certain things? For example, they are expensive, you can’t get to the shops, or you don’t know enough about how to go about buying them.
- How important are those things to you?
- Would you be likely to use this group?
• What things would you be likely to buy?
• Where do you buy these things now?
• How much do you spend on this at present?
• What would the group need to do to persuade you to change your buying habits?
• How much would you be likely to spend through the group?
• How would you want to make purchases (e.g. if you are setting up a shop, what days and times would people come to buy; what location would be convenient?)

You can also ask if people would be interested in volunteering or getting involved in running the group and the best way to communicate with people (for marketing purposes).

In addition, talk to people who are already active in the local community and to local public services to find out their views on what is needed and what resources there might be to help your group succeed.

Tip: Don’t raise people’s expectations too highly about what can be achieved or the levels of savings they are likely to get.

Map out resources that could help you in your area:
- Community buildings and other facilities, such as computer equipment, that you might be able to use
- Groups already in existence in the community (e.g. clubs, classes, churches) who might want to work together with you, buy from you or help promote your group.
- Where you might be able to get training or access to skills.

You will also need to find out about businesses that can supply you with your product or service, what they are selling and how much for. (See Suppliers).

And is there anyone else doing what you want to do in your area? If so, should you join up with them? Or do you offer something a bit different or extra?

Once you have done your research, it is useful to produce an action plan setting out:
- What you are going to do
- How you are going to do it
- Who is going to do it
- When and where
- What resources you need to do it (e.g. money, premises, skills) and where you will find them
For a useful and simple template for an action plan see: www.sustainweb.org/foodcoopstoolkit/planning

You need to work out how much the costs are likely to be and take this into account when considering the feasibility of your plan.

If your group is large scale and you want to apply for large amounts of funding, then you may need a more detailed business plan. For a business plan template see www.sustainweb.org/foodcoopstoolkit/planning.

You can also get information and support with business planning from www.businesslink.gov.uk/newservices.

The Institute of Chartered Accountants also provides an initial free consultation to a wide range of enterprises. http://www.businessadviceservice.com

Information about business mentoring can be found at Mentorsme.

You might want to put some short-term goals in your plan that will help you reach your objective – for example, recruiting a certain number of volunteers.

Suppliers

You will need to find businesses that can supply you with the product or services you are interested in. You will want, preferably, to find businesses willing to give a discount for bulk buying.

Suppliers include:

- Wholesalers and cash and carries. They usually only sell to businesses. To register for a trade card, which allows you entry, your group would generally need documents such as a bill, invoice or VAT receipt. Community buying groups who don’t have these documents and would like advice on how to register should contact the Federation of Wholesale Distributors at nikki@fwd-uk.com or 01323 724952.

- Retailers (who offer a discount or have cheap deals).

How you identify suppliers and deal with them will vary a lot depending on what it is you are buying. However, it is very likely to involve negotiating with the supplier to get the best deal. As you are buying in bulk, this gives you an advantage when asking for discounts.

However, price is not the only factor when selecting who to buy from. Other factors include reliability and good customer service. Think about what requirements you may have in addition to price and find out if suppliers can meet them. Building a good relationship with your supplier is also important.
Tips:

If you have a number of potential suppliers ask them all the same standard questions so you can compare their answers easily.

Talking to businesses helps you learn about the products or services you are buying, which will help you run your group.

Don't just negotiate on price as this can potentially lower quality.

Being prepared to switch suppliers, or having more than one supplier, can encourage them to keep prices down. On the other hand, building and keeping a good relationship with one supplier may help you to make sure that you continue to get what you want from them.

The price of some goods or services may go up and down frequently (e.g. certain fruits and vegetables, heating oil). To get the best deal, you will need to keep an eye on price changes to pick the right time to buy.

Example: the R Shop Bulk Buying group looks out for multibuys and special offers on household goods from supermarkets, and stockpiles them to sell in their shop.

Food co-operatives buy food from a range of sources including local wholesalers and wholesale markets, whole food suppliers, farmers, and sometimes retailers. It is worth asking local retailers if they will offer a discount for a bulk order, especially if you can commit to buying from them regularly. For more information on food suppliers, see www.sustainweb.org/foodcoopstoolkit

If you are buying something relatively complex and expensive (such as solar panels) you will need to do in-depth research into what different suppliers offer. To select your supplier it's a good idea to carry out a tendering exercise where you ask a number of suppliers to bid.

Tendering

With a tendering exercise, you identify what your requirements are, set them out on paper and ask suppliers to submit bids. You assess the bids according to standard criteria.

It’s a good idea to do some preliminary investigation of suppliers first, and narrow down the number you ask to bid. That saves time having to assess lots of bids (and saves suppliers their time too).

It's good practice for a number of people to assess bids rather than just one person. Having several people means they notice different elements of the bids that one person might miss. The group can collectively get a better understanding of bids by exchanging views.
Example: Sustainable Wantage (a voluntary and not for profit group) ran a tendering exercise where they asked installers of solar panels to submit bids. The successful bidders were chosen based on product quality, credibility and price.

For specialist advice on what to consider when dealing with suppliers of heating oil, see Best Practice in Oil Buying Groups.

In heating oil clubs and some solar energy groups, while the group's organiser negotiates the deal with the supplier on behalf of members, it is the responsibility of each individual member to pay the supplier. The organiser does not have to handle money, making things simpler. This can also help to ensure that group members benefit from consumer protection legislation.

If the supplier still needs to process payments separately, this can reduce its cost savings and therefore the savings for your group. If you are buying something very expensive, though, this reduction in savings would make little difference.

If you do take this option, you will still need a clear agreement with the supplier about what it will provide to your group’s members. Members need to be clear about payment arrangements too.

You may want to consider whether or not you want the agreement to be legally binding. If you want to be able to make a claim against the supplier if things go wrong, then you will need the agreement to be legally binding. It may be fine, to have an agreement which is not legally binding, if you think you would never want to bring a claim. An agreement doesn’t have to be written down to be legally binding. The simplest way to make your intention clear, though, is to write in the agreement whether or not it is intended to be legally binding.

Example: Transition Town Marlow 100 Solar group made a written agreement, a Memorandum of Understanding (MoU), with its supplier, Freesource Energy, although its members paid the company directly for the installation of solar panels at their houses. Philip Ditchfield, the Project Lead, explains: “Our requirements, the discounts, payment structure, type of equipment, technology, and so on, were defined in a document rather than just agreed verbally. The MoU was also a guide to how the project was to be implemented. It wasn’t legally binding, but we felt it was simpler, quicker and less expensive than having a lawyer draft a contract.”
How should we organise our group?

It’s a good idea to consider, particularly if your group gets bigger, whether you want to make your purpose, structure and rules more formal.

The lack of a written agreement may be a hindrance. For example, members may be uncertain about what the group is setting out to achieve and how you are going to operate.

If the group wants to open a bank account or apply for funding, you are likely to need to provide governing documents such as terms of reference, a written constitution, or a statement of your rules and aims and objectives. A bank or lender will want to know precisely who they are dealing with.

These documents set out what your group has agreed, for example, on who can join, the roles and responsibilities of group members, how decisions will be made, how any funds will be used, etc.

There are standard templates that tell you what you need to consider. (See Annex A).

It could be helpful to seek advice on how the group should operate from other organisations, such as other similar groups. But to be lasting, the group must be responsible for running itself. Having some written documentation about how the group operates and decision making can help groups continue running in the longer term.

Legal structures

These are legal forms which your group may want to adopt, particularly if it gets bigger and more ambitious. The law can affect you in different ways depending on what you have chosen. One of the main decisions is whether to be unincorporated or incorporated.

Unincorporated

Unincorporated associations are an informal structure of people who have come together for a particular purpose. An unincorporated association can operate with terms of reference or written constitution. Operating as an unincorporated association means that if it experiences financial difficulties, members are personally liable for the debts of the group.
Incorporated

With most incorporated bodies, on the other hand, members automatically have limited liability. That is, members will not have to bear all the costs if the group faces financial difficulties. As the group gets bigger, it may take bigger risks and so the advantages of incorporation increase. There are different types of incorporated body which include:

- Limited Company – this corporate legal structure can be adapted to suit most purposes. Directors manage the business on behalf of its members, whose liability is limited by guarantee or by shares (companies limited by guarantee are often used for social or not for profit enterprises, whilst companies limited by shares are normally used for companies which are intended to be profit making).

- Community Interest Company – a limited company which exists to provide benefits for the community.

Both have to be registered with Companies House. A Co-operative

Your group might also want to consider becoming a co-operative. They can take a number of legal forms. These include the Industrial and Provident Societies (IPSs) which are incorporated legal forms. There are two types of IPS.

1. The IPS Co-operative: Its basic characteristics are one member, one vote; if profits are shared between members, they must be shared equitably and there must be no artificial restrictions on membership.

2. Community Benefit Societies, similar to IPS Co-operatives, but have a requirement to primarily benefit people other than their members.

The advantage of both forms is that they guarantee members’ rights and democratic decision making. They are both registered with the Financial Services Authority. Co-operatives sign up to the principles of the International Co-operative Alliance.

<td>What it is</td>
<td>A group of individuals coming together for a particular purpose. No formal agreement about objectives, roles or how it will work.</td>
<td>A group of individuals coming together for a particular purpose but has a terms of reference or written constitution. It is not a separate entity. Includes some co-operatives.</td>
<td>Registered as a separate entity – often a company – and so recognised as having an identity in its own right (i.e. has rights and duties separate from its members). Various forms e.g. Limited Company; Community Interest Company, and IPSs.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Advantages</td>
<td>Flexible and easy if your group is new or small and you aren’t taking any financial risks. No costs or administration.</td>
<td>Still relatively easy and flexible. No paperwork to submit to external regulators and you don’t need to inform anyone. Little or no start up costs.</td>
<td>Protection for members if group gets into financial difficulties or has other liabilities. So useful if your group is taking risks such as borrowing money, leasing premises, taking on employees.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Disadvantages</td>
<td>Could cause problems if unclear what group is trying to achieve and how it operates. Could be a barrier to raising funds and opening a bank account.</td>
<td>No protection for members if group gets into financial difficulties or incurs other liabilities. Because it is not a separate legal entity, it can’t own property or enter into contracts (though its members can do so).</td>
<td>Some administration and cost. Potentially more responsibilities for complying with legal requirements. Need to appoint officers who will have legal responsibilities.</td>
</tr>

The legal form you take will have implications for your legal responsibilities. If you form an incorporated body, you are likely to have more administrative responsibilities. It may also be more likely that that body is found to be carrying on a business, which may have implications for the application of consumer protection legislation. However, the legal form is not decisive as to whether a business is being carried on. (See Community Buying Groups and the Law).

Charities

Being a charity gives a legal status; it’s not a group’s legal form. Operating as a charity has tax advantages and can help fundraising. But registering as a charity imposes some regulatory requirements and may reduce flexibility. There are also restrictions on the type of trading a charity can engage in (unless the charity has a trading subsidiary).

How do we run our group?

This section covers:

- Premises
- Resources and equipment
- Administration
- Volunteers

Premises

Depending on the focus and scale of your project, you may not need premises. A small group can run in someone’s home or you may operate as an online or telephone network. But you may need storage for goods and a place to sell them and/or want to be open to large numbers of people. In which case places such as schools, church halls, community centres and other community buildings could be suitable locations.

Things to consider are:

- Location: will your customers find it easy to get to?

- The rent: ideally you want a venue that is free or cheap. But some community organisations may rely on income from renting rooms. So you will need to sell the benefits to the organisation of letting you have rooms for free, for example, by attracting people who will use other services or activities.

- Storage and/or selling space: how much do you need and how much is available?

- Whether people already use the venue: if your group operates at a place and time where people already meet, then it will help you to reach out to people who might buy from you or join your group.

- Access to a computer, printer and photocopier: will the venue provide this? How much will they charge?

See also Community buying groups and the law – Renting business premises.

Resources and equipment

What you need will depend on the focus and scale of your group and whether you are handling cash.
- Cash box or till – you may not need a till if you operate on a small scale, but it's quicker and easier if you have a lot of customers.

- Calculator

- Access to phone, computer and printer, photocopier and perhaps a fax machine.

- Transport. You can use a member's car although if your group gets bigger then you may consider raising funds to buy a vehicle. You will need suitable insurance. Even if you are not buying a vehicle for the group, you may need to check that the insurance for a member's car would cover the group's purposes.

Alternatively, you could rent or use a carclub. For more details of carclubs (which include both commercial and community operators) see www.carplus.org.uk/carplus.

- Other equipment. If you are selling food, you may need equipment such as scales, bags, boxes and shopping baskets (see www.sustainweb.org/foodcoопstoolkit). You can ask local businesses to donate equipment or can look out for or advertise for equipment (new or secondhand) on Freecycle. Freecycle groups match people who have things they want to get rid of with people who can use them.

For more details on ways to fund equipment see Raising money section.

Administration

It's good to have clear and simple procedures that everyone knows about and are easy to follow.
In some groups, customers need to order what they want in advance so that you know how much to buy from suppliers. You will need to develop a procedure for collecting and recording orders.

You also need to consider what the arrangements are for customers to pay you (or the supplier, if they pay the supplier directly). This should include whether the customer will have to pay part or all of the cost if they cancel an order. You should make these arrangements clear to your customers in advance.

Options include taking orders by email, phone, using paper order forms or a community website or Facebook page. If people don't have or use a computer:

- A volunteer can coordinate orders on their behalf.
- Someone can 'buddy up' with them to help them use a computer.

When collecting orders, give people enough advance notice to respond to you.

Example: the coordinator of Chieveley Oil Club, West Berkshire, sends out email every 8-12 weeks to 210 households to ask for orders. Members return orders by email and those without access to email ask neighbours and friends to place orders on their behalf. The coordinator collates orders and additional information on a spreadsheet, and then rings round suppliers to ask for prices. See Best Practice for Oil Buying Groups.

Tip: When you order from suppliers, it's a good idea to order by fax or email if you can, so everything is written down in case of problems.

Volunteers

If people volunteer their time for free it is possible to keep costs low. Many people say they enjoy and gain a lot from volunteering, including meeting new people, making friends, getting more confidence, developing new skills and gaining experience that can be used to get a new job.

It’s important to consider the time needed to set up and run the group, especially if you are one of the key people involved. Time will be needed for administration and coordination, liaising with public services; PR and marketing; dealing with customers and suppliers; and possibly fund raising. Be realistic about how much time key people can commit to the group.
Groups often have a core team of people who set up and run them. But you may need other volunteers to help out (and to make sure they get and stay involved it is a good idea for them to become group members). The group needs to think how to involve volunteers so that the work is shared out, as relying on one person can mean they get overloaded and the group could collapse if or when that person move on.

Some points to consider are:

- How many volunteers you need
- Whether there are specific tasks and roles you want to match volunteers to
- How to recruit them such as through your local support and development organisation, often called a Voluntary Action or Council for Voluntary Services. REACH matches skilled volunteers to voluntary organisations. www.volwork.org.uk. For young people see www.do-it.org.uk.

The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales also advertises voluntary roles to its members free of charge and will be a good way of sourcing volunteers with financial management experience. See www.icaew.com.

- Whether you require a minimum contribution from them (e.g. number of hours per month).
- Whether you are going to interview volunteers, give them an induction, and set out the role and expectations in a written agreement

If you have lots of volunteers, you may want someone to coordinate them. You need to consider:

- If you pay volunteers’ expenses then a wider range of people can participate. However, you need to be careful because paying more than out of pocket expenses can affect entitlement to state benefits and the amounts could be taxable. It is safest to pay only volunteers’ direct costs such as travel to and from home.

- Under certain circumstances, you might be creating a contract of employment with the volunteer. Certain responsibilities would then start to apply. For further information, see sections on how the law applies to employees and volunteers.

- You may need to take out public liability insurance in case the volunteer has an accident

- There are potential health and safety requirements, particularly if your group also employs people.

See also Community buying groups and the law.
Example: The ‘R shop’ in Maidstone, Kent, recruits volunteers for their bulk buying group by establishing a link with a Time Banking scheme. Time Banking links people locally to share their time and skills. In the R Shop scheme, people earn credits for time spent volunteering, including volunteering in the shop. They can then spend the credits in the shop.

Community organisations often give the main day-to-day responsibility for finances to one person (the treasurer). However, everyone running the group should share responsibility for making sure money is looked after.

If your group is quite small or members pay the supplier direct, your financial administration will be relatively simple. This section tells you about the basics as well as other topics you may need to know about if your group gets bigger or more complex.

This section tells you about:
- Opening a bank account
- Planning and keeping track of money
- Ways for customers to pay you
- Costs and prices
- Raising money
- Tax and business rates
- Further information and sources of advice

Opening a bank account

You may not need one:
- If you are running a small scale group which only deals in cash
- If you are running a group where members, rather than the group, each pay the supplier direct

But without a bank account:
- You will be limited to buying from suppliers who take cash (unless group members pay suppliers directly)
- Relying on cash has risks such as money going astray.
- You won’t get the advantages of having a bank account such as a cheque book or internet banking.

You will need a bank account if you want to make applications for funding.

Your first port of call should be to go into a local bank branch and speak to a member of staff about the options available to you at that bank. Many banks offer accounts that are tailored for community and voluntary organisations, charities and co-operatives. Some banks also produce online guides to finance for community organisations and treasurers.

Make sure you shop around. Many banks offer different services and accounts with varying features. Ensure you’ve satisfied yourself and the rest of the people in your group that you have had a chance to understand what options are out there for you.

What to think about when opening an account

- You may want to consider nominating at least two people who can authorise withdrawals (such as cheques). Some banks allow several signatories on to an account. Speak to your local bank to understand what they offer.

- Are you happy paying for services that a bank offers? Make sure you compare the services offered by different banks and understand if there are charges that come with them and how those are applied.

- Do you want internet, post or phone access? Ask your bank about the safest ways to authorise withdrawals and other transactions.

- Do you want direct debit and credit facilities (paying suppliers directly)? If so, you will need good financial and accounting systems.

- If you have lots of cash, consider what interest the bank pays on the money (it may not be much if you get free banking). You may want to open a separate deposit account paying a higher rate.

- Some community buying groups run in partnerships with others, such as with local authorities and they may be able to open up a bank account on your behalf.

- Talk to your bank about their relationship managers. They will be available to support you once you’ve opened an account and can provide information on many things such as managing your cash flow and how to save money.

Planning and keeping track of money

It’s a good idea to plan what money you will need and how you will use it. Unless your group is extremely small scale, this means drawing up a budget, say, for the next year ahead. You will also need to control how money is received and spent. For example, keeping records of everything you spend and the income you receive. Keep track regularly of how the finances are going and how much cash you have.

The larger scale and more ambitious the project, the more sophisticated budgets and controls needs to be.

You will need systems for handling money and keeping records of what you spend, orders, sales and of members and customers' contact details. If you are keeping personal data on members, customers or volunteers, then you will need to comply with requirements of the Data Protection Act.

Information Commissioners’ Office: www.ico.gov.uk.

The budget should cover all your costs, including stock, transport, photocopying, volunteer expenses etc. You should also keep receipts and invoices.

You can keep records on paper or use a computer spreadsheet such as Open Office/Libre Office Calc (which are available for free) or Microsoft Excel. The advantages of using a spreadsheet are that it can be e-mailed to members; it is in a standard format and it will calculate for you, for example, your total sales or what you have spent. However, you will need access to a computer and software and will need someone with IT skills to use it. You may be able to get training.

However you decide to do it, make sure you have a copy of your records (back-up computer or paper copy).

A more ambitious option would be an on-line ordering system. Your customers will need to have internet access and it would be more expensive for you to run.

It is a good idea for more than one person to have access to, and be able to use, the finance system, in case the main person managing the finance is ill or away.

If you are going to apply for funding, it is important to have good financial records as funders may want to see your accounts.
Ways for customers to pay you

If customers are paying directly into your group's bank account, then they can pay you by cheque or, if it is a regular payment, by standing order. But if customers don't have a bank account and are paying by cash, your group will need simple procedures to make sure it doesn't run into problems. Everyone handling cash will need to know these procedures. For more detailed information on procedures for handling cash, see the Food Co-operatives Toolkit. Many banks also provide guidance for treasurers.

Costs and pricing

Consider whether you need to add a mark up to the price that you buy the goods for, to cover your costs. You may not have many costs, especially if you are operating out of someone's house and/or it's a small scale group.

Some groups charge a fee to members to cover expenses. This needs to be clearly communicated to members.

Costs can include:

- Stock
- Rent
- Insurance
- Volunteer Expenses
- Buying and replacing equipment
- Office expenses (use of computer, photocopier, fax, stationery, telephone etc)
- Transport costs
- Promotion and marketing

Tip: The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales advertises voluntary positions to its members free of charge and will be a good way of sourcing volunteers with financial management experience. See www.icaew.com.

Raising money

Not all community buying groups need to raise funds or seek finance; for example, if you are running a small scale group from home, or have use of resources such as a community venue or computer equipment for free or low cost. In some cases, you may be able to use the income from your sales to cover any costs. Raising funding can in itself cost money and may involve risk.

If, however, you do want to get additional funds, for example, to expand your activities, there are a number of options:
Local support agencies for the voluntary and community sector: they can help you to identify and approach potential sources of funding. To find one near you, contact your local authority or see National Association of Voluntary and Community Action, which has a searchable directory of local support organisations carrying the whole of England.

The equivalent organisations in Scotland, Northern Ireland and Wales are:

- The Scottish Council for Voluntary Organisations
- The Northern Ireland Council for Voluntary Action
- Wales Council for Voluntary Action

Other sources of information about grants are local Citizens Advice offices, libraries and local authority websites.

Business sponsorship: local businesses may be able to offer cash or benefits such as promotion and marketing, equipment or expertise. For example, they might promote your buying group to its employees. The businesses will benefit from good PR and goodwill.

Loans: from a bank, building society etc: You will need to be able to repay the loan and any interest payment from your income, so there is some risk.

Community Development Financial Institutions: these provide loans to people and businesses which have problems getting finance from mainstream lenders. Some also offer business support and financial advice. As with taking out any loan, there is some risk involved. See www.cdfa.org.uk.

Grants: from central and local government, the National Lottery and charitable trusts. You will need a written constitution and bank account. If you don’t have these yet, you may be able to apply via another organisation you are working with, such as a school or community organisation. Funders generally want to support new activity, rather than pay for on-going running costs, so it is important to consider how you will manage once the money has run out.

In all cases of funding it is important to be clear what, if any, legal obligations are required in return for the funding, and who will be responsible for meeting these obligations.

Tax

The way in which tax applies to your group will depend on its precise structure and the activities your group engage in. This guide provides an overview of possible tax implications that may or may not apply to your group. For specific advice tailored to your group you can contact HM Revenue and Customs.
Value Added Tax (VAT)

VAT is charged on most goods or services:
- supplied for consideration,
- by way of business,
- where the supplier is VAT registered.

Bodies have to register for VAT only when their sales exceed a certain threshold, which in 2011/12 is £73,000. The HMRC website will give the latest figure. Bodies making taxable supplies at a level below this amount can apply to HMRC for VAT registration on a voluntary basis.

Bodies that are VAT registered and supply goods or services which are subject to VAT can, with certain exceptions, recover the VAT paid on the goods and services they purchase for their business. They must also account to HMRC for VAT charged on goods or services they sell.

Will my group be considered a business?

For VAT purposes, the term ‘business’ has a wide meaning, which is more concerned with how regularly supplies are made than with matters such as intention and profit.

It is unlikely that an unincorporated group of individuals, which has simply formed to take advantage of stronger purchasing power and only buys goods and services for its members, will be regarded as conducting a business activity for VAT purposes. It will, therefore, have no requirement or entitlement to register for VAT.

It is possible that a group incorporated as a company could be making taxable supplies of goods and services to its members, but this is not conclusive.

People thinking about forming groups are advised to seek advice on VAT from HMRC. You should be especially careful to ensure that bulk ordering does not lose the advantage of any relief from VAT that might be otherwise available.

Tax on profits made by your group

Corporation tax or income tax may need to be paid on the profits made by your group.

The direct tax treatment of a group of individuals will depend on the structure adopted by your group and the specific nature of its activities and it is possible that your group may not be required to pay tax at all.

Business Rates

Business rates are paid by occupiers of most non-domestic premises including shops and offices. Many groups will get free use of, or rent a room from, community organisations and so won’t have to pay business rates. However, if a group is the main occupier of non-domestic premises then business rates will apply. Some groups may be able to apply for relief, for instance, if they are a charity or non-profit organisation. Rural businesses such as a local village shop may also obtain relief.

How do we market and promote our group?

Think about marketing from the start. If what you are buying, or buying and selling, or how you do it doesn’t appeal to customers your group won’t succeed. That’s why initial research is so important to identify the people who are most likely to buy through or from you (for example, families with young children). See Planning your project section. You will also need to ensure it is being bought, or bought and sold, at a price that people will pay while still covering your costs.

There are a number of different ways to promote your group and to sell its benefits. You should think about how to reach your particular target audience most effectively (and at least cost). For example:

- Set up a Facebook Page
- Visit local clubs and groups to talk about your project
- Use notice boards for example in libraries and health centres or put a notice in a shop window
- Use newsletters (paper or email)
- Give out information at community events and local markets
- Create your own website (for example, you could make and upload a short film).
- Use local media (newspaper, radio, websites)
- Use local email groups
- Run a launch event or special promotions

If you don’t want your group to get too big (so that it stays manageable), then you might want to limit how widely you publicise it.

Tips:

Find out how your potential customers currently get and receive information, and what works already for them.

Get feedback from your customers – for example, what do they like about the group? Can they think of any improvements?
How do I develop new skills?

Community buying groups are an excellent way to get new skills in setting up and running both a community organisation and a business. These skills include:

- Computers and IT
- Business planning
- Team working
- Managing money
- Fundraising
- Research
- Managing a project
- Communications
- Sales, promotion and marketing (e.g. producing leaflets or posters, speaking to an audience about your group, creating a website)

You may be able to find free or low cost ways of training or other help with developing your skills.

Informal adult and community learning (IACL)

This describes classes and activities that bring people together. The learning can be about developing an interest, improving a skill, addressing a need (like supporting a family on a tight budget), becoming healthier or supporting children at school. The learning is often done out of personal interest rather than for a qualification.

Government departments fund this kind of learning through Local Authority adult education services, further education colleges and voluntary organisations. Much of the learning is focused on improving confidence, communication, employment prospects, computer skills, financial management and mental and/or physical health. Contact your local adult education service or college to find out what’s available or discuss the kinds of local courses you’d like. Some people also come together to organise their own learning. If you’re interested in setting up and running a self-organised group, here are some toolkits to help:

Community buying groups and the law

This section covers how the law could affect you. It covers:

- Renting business premises
- Your responsibilities for complying with the law
- Further sources of legal advice

The need to comply with the law should not usually be regarded as a burden which puts anybody off forming or expanding a community buying group. There are of course very many successful groups which have not been held back by these issues. It is mainly a question of awareness, taking low cost advice where needed and taking a common sense approach to compliance.

Renting business premises

You may not need to rent premises if you can get free use of a room or rent one in a community organisation. However, if your group becomes large and well established, it may wish to rent more permanent premises. The local council may have a register of suitable premises.

If your group operates in England and Wales

License agreements are flexible, short-term (typically lasting up to two years) and usually much less onerous than a lease. Licence agreements are easier to terminate at short notice by either the tenant or the landlord. This can be an advantage as the group will not be tied down to the premises but means the landlord can end the agreement with little warning.

With lease agreements, you are likely to be bound to occupy the premises for several years. There may be quite onerous maintenance and repair obligations along with other restrictions. If your situation changes and you want to move on you may experience difficulties, it may be difficult to find a replacement tenant and therefore you may still have to pay rent and other outgoings even if you are no longer occupying the premises.

For further information on renting business premises:
www.businesslink.gov.uk/bdotg/action/layer?r.i=1075411780&r.l1=1073858805&r.l2=1073859128&r.l3=1075411730&r.s=sc&r.t=RESOURCES&topicId=1075411730
If your group operates in Scotland

There is not the same distinction as in England and Wales between licences and leases but your group will have a choice over the length of its lease. Your group should look at the terms of the lease carefully to make sure it meets the needs of your group and does not impose any obligations that your group can’t or won't want to comply with.

Complying with the law

Community buying groups – particularly those which become bigger and more ambitious or operate as a business – will have various responsibilities for complying with the law. Whether or not you become an incorporated body is only one factor that affects a group’s legal obligations. Informal buying clubs and unincorporated associations must also comply with the law that applies to them, but may be less likely to take steps – such as becoming an employer – that give rise to additional legal obligations.

This guide includes pointers to some of these obligations, but it isn’t a complete list and can only be very general. You may need to get legal advice on your particular circumstances. Sources of low cost advice can be found at the end of the guide.

Consumer Protection

Various laws protect consumers when they buy goods and services from businesses. For example, the law requires that products must be fit for purpose and of satisfactory quality and that contract terms must be fair. If you buy something that is faulty, you can get a refund, replacement or repair from the supplier.

Some groups ask one or more individuals to negotiate on behalf of the group to buy goods or services but the final contract of sale occurs directly between the business supplying the goods or services and individual group members. In these circumstances, the purchasing group member will be protected by consumer protection legislation and can go directly to the supplier if they experience any problems. This is a relatively straightforward approach to take.

Where, on the other hand, there is a contract of sale between the supplier and the group, it may help if you are clear as a group whether the group is simply buying things on behalf of the members, or whether it is buying and then selling things in its own right (and so, for example, taking the risk if there is unsold stock).

Where members of a group or the general public buy directly from the group itself, how consumer protection legislation applies will depend on the circumstances. It will largely depend on:
The structure of the group i.e. whether it is a small informal group, an Unincorporated or an incorporated body.

Whether the group itself is acting as a business. This may apply even if the group is not trying to make a profit: the question is, rather, whether it is operating commercially or professionally. How substantial and regular its activity is will also be relevant.

Informal groups and unincorporated associations

If a member of the group buys from a supplier on behalf of the group and its members and doesn't operate as a business, the initial supplier will be responsible for complying with consumer protection legislation. Unless the supplier agreed otherwise, the person who bought the goods from the supplier would have to enforce the rights. For example, they would have to take faulty goods back to a shop. This is because the person who bought the goods entered into a contract of sale with the supplier. They are seen as an individual consumer buying goods on behalf of other individual consumers. Advice about enforcing consumer rights can be found at consumer direct

However, where members of groups buy and sell goods, perhaps selling at a higher price to cover overhead costs, or buying in bulk, not knowing exactly how much they are going to sell on, then the situation could be different. In some circumstances, this may be regarded as a business. In that case, the original supplier to the group will not be responsible for complying with consumer protection legislation (although, quite apart from consumer protection, there could still be a claim against the original supplier for breach of contract). Instead, individuals buying from the group might be entitled to make a claim against the group (or, more precisely, members of the group). While this may be a limited risk, groups need to be aware of this.

Incorporated Bodies

A community buying group in this category which buys goods and sells them on is likely to be considered as acting as a business, even if it doesn't make profits. If there is a problem with goods or services bought from the supplier, the group won't be able to enforce rights against the supplier under consumer protection legislation (although again, quite apart from consumer protection legislation, it could still claim against the supplier for breach of contract). Those buying from a group which is an incorporated body will have rights against the group. The group will need to know about its responsibilities under consumer protection law and make sure it is complying with them.

Advertising and marketing – fair trading

Any group that acts as a business must also deal fairly with its members and with members of the public in the way that it advertises and markets itself and its goods and services. This means, in particular, not making misleading statements and ensuring that people dealing with the group have the information they need to make buying decisions. See: the BIS (previously BERR)/OFT guidance on the Consumer Protection from Unfair Trading Regulations 2008.

Further advice on consumer protection legislation can be obtained from your Local Authority Trading Standards www.tradingstandards.gov.uk/advice/index.cfm

Safe food

Any group supplying food must ensure that it is handled in a safe and hygienic way. Any group starting a new food business must also make sure it registers with their local authority. Further advice can be obtained from your local authority. Local authority details can be found here: www.direct.gov.uk/en/D11/Directories/Localcouncils/index.htm

For further information on food safety see: www.food.gov.uk/foodindustry/regulation/foodlaw

Safe products

Some groups selling goods may need to comply with product safety legislation and ensure the products supplied are safe to use. This obligation will apply to groups acting in the course of a business. In addition, the company or person that supplied the products initially to the group acting in the course of a business may also be responsible for any breach of legislation. Therefore groups which are businesses may consider taking out product liability insurance to cover any claims made by members or the wider public suffering damage to property or injury from products supplied by the group.

Weights and measures

Groups selling products that require measurement such as meat, vegetables and drinks may need to ensure they comply with weights and measures requirements in terms of how the product is priced and its weight is specified.

Street trading

Any group that intends to trade in the street, for example, at a stall, will probably need to apply for a licence or consent from the Local Authority.

Further advice can by obtained from your Local Authority:
www.direct.gov.uk/en/DI1/Directories/Localcouncils/index.htm

Price labelling

Groups that buy and sell goods as a business have to meet requirements on displaying the price of any goods sold to consumers. Broadly the group must ensure prices are displayed clearly and including VAT. This requirement does not apply to the sale of services. For both goods and services price indications must not be misleading.

Further advice can by obtained from your Local Authority Trading Standards:
www.tradingstandards.gov.uk/advice/index.cfm

Volunteers

It’s important to ensure the legal status of volunteers is clear. If there is a contract between the group and the person who is volunteering, then they may be regarded as a worker (and will have some employment rights) or even an employee (with full employment rights). A contract doesn’t have to be written.

One important issue is the National Minimum Wage. This applies to anyone who is a “worker”.
Volunteers – A volunteer does not have an employment contract or any form of contract to personally perform work or provide services so will not be a “worker”. This means that the minimum wage does not apply to them.

Voluntary Worker – A person who has an employment contract or any form of contract to personally perform work or provide services will be a ‘worker’. However, in certain circumstances they will not qualify for the national minimum wage because of an exclusion which applies to “voluntary workers”. For this exclusion to apply, the individual must work for a charity or voluntary organisation. Also, they must only be paid for the costs they have incurred carrying out the voluntary work (out of pocket expenses) e.g. the cost of lunch and travelling to and from their home to the place the voluntary work is carried out. The minimum wage does not then apply.

If they are paid more than out of pocket expenses, they are not classed as a “voluntary worker” and will be entitled to the minimum wage. Paying more than out of pocket expenses may also affect the volunteer’s state benefits and the amounts could be taxable.

Various conditions must be met for someone to be considered a voluntary worker. More detailed information on volunteers and the national minimum wage can be found at: www.businesslink.gov.uk/bdotg/action/detail?itemId=1096704158&r.i=1096704110&r.l1=1073858787&r.l2=1084822773&r.l3=1081657912&r.l4=1096697303&r.s=sc&r.t=RESOURCES&type=RESOURCES

If your group has employees

Some larger groups may wish to employ people to help run the group. If it does, it must be aware of its legal responsibilities as an employer. These responsibilities include:
- paying the employee, including observing the National Minimum Wage;
- providing the employee with information about their rights;
- treating the employee with trust and respect;
- observing the law against discrimination; and
- dealing with employee complaints.

Further information on employer responsibilities can be found at: www.businesslink.gov.uk/bdotg/action/layer?topicId=1073859176
www.businesslink.gov.uk/bdotg/action/layer?topicId=1073858787
An employer has a legal duty to provide a safe working environment for its employees and anyone else affected by its activities, such as volunteers and customers. This includes a requirement to have employer liability insurance, to carry out a risk assessment of any premises and equipment and to provide health and safety training.

Health and Safety

Duties arising out of specific health and safety legislation largely apply to the work activities of employers (see Employees section) and so are unlikely to affect most groups. Limited duties may also arise under health and safety legislation where a group uses non-domestic premises.

All groups will need to consider more general obligations arising under the common law and ensure that it or its members do not carelessly cause injury to others. This simply requires a sensible and proportionate approach and shouldn’t be too onerous.

For further guidance on your obligations under the common law, see www.hse.gov.uk/voluntary/when-it-applies.htm

If your group employs people or uses non-domestic premises, see www.hse.gov.uk/voluntary/index.htm

Your liability as an occupier of premises

Any group that becomes the occupier of premises must take reasonable care to ensure the safety of visitors to those premises. This will generally apply to any group (whether incorporated or not) that is considered to be in control of the premises. If this liability applies to a group, it may be a good idea to take out occupiers’ liability insurance to cover against the possibility of a personal injury claim. Bear in mind that the group will only be required to take reasonable care and if sensible, proportionate approaches are taken the chance of a personal injury claim being made will be small.

Insurance

Larger, more established groups operating as a business are more likely to need to take out insurance but smaller and more informal groups may also need insurance. Appropriate motor vehicle insurance is compulsory if you use a vehicle and if you employ people, so is employers’ liability insurance. Other aspects of insurance are covered earlier in this chapter:

- Employers’ liability insurance (see ‘If your group has employees’)
- Occupiers’ liability insurance (see ‘Your liability as an occupier of premises’)
- Product liability insurance (see ‘Safe products’)

Public liability insurance – This will cover injury, death or damage to property caused by a member of a group, employee or volunteer. It will also cover associated costs such as legal fees. Both formal incorporated and informal groups may wish to take out public liability insurance. Informal groups should obtain further advice about whether it is advisable.

For further information see:
www.businesslink.gov.uk/bdotg/action/detail?itemId=1074301656&type=RESOURCES

Motor vehicle insurance – This is compulsory. A group should bear in mind that using a vehicle owned by one of its members (or a volunteer) for the purposes of the group may be considered business use. An accident may not be covered by the person’s personal insurance. Check with the insurer first to see if they consider your activities constitute business use, and if so, if you are covered by the policy. If your group owns the vehicle you will need to ensure you have suitable insurance.

Annex A

Committee/Group Terms of Reference Template

Please note these can be tailored according to whatever direction the group decides to take.

Name:

(Official name of the committee or group)

Members:

[It might not be practical to name all members individually, but any areas of responsibility should be made clear]

Contact Information - Roles / Responsibilities (e.g. chair, secretary, treasurer, report to the board)

Aims of the Group:

For example, financial savings for members, or good quality goods and services, or community cohesion

Resources and Budget (if applicable)

(E.g. equipment, materials, rooms, funds available to the committee.)

Governance

(Decision-making processes, e.g. consensus, 2/3 majority vote or chair's authority, etc.)

Additional Notes

How communications outside of meetings will be conducted, e.g. phone or email.

Frequency of meetings
Example of a Written Constitution

This should give details of why the organisation exists, what it is there to do, how it is going to do it and how it is organised.

This prevents misunderstandings among the membership and allows new members to understand what it is they are joining. A governing document can be changed by the membership.

A typical governing document will set out clearly:

- The name of the organisation
- What the organisation is going to do (also known as the “Objects”)
- Who can become a member of the organisation
- How members can join or leave
- How and when general meetings are called
- How many members have to be present in order for decisions to be legitimate (also known as being “quorate” at general meetings)
- Who is allowed to vote at general meetings
- Election of a committee – if applicable
- What happens to any profit made by the group (also known as “application of surplus”)
- How the governing document can be changed
- How and what happens if the organisation is dissolved
