You raised two specific points of concern on our call that I can address:

Can we guarantee that field trials work will not be adversely impacted by the plantings?

In undertaking our joint industry field trial, the trial will look to secure an experimental permit for planting of seed in Scotland – which will not be covered by any permit for use. Should we be unable to secure this permit we would look to create exclusionary zones in England adjacent to each of the study locations.

Due to the size requirements of the trial and the buffer zone separating the trial from commercial crop the exclusion zone should be in the form of an individual county where the risk level of either early drilling is not expected and/or the expected level of flea beetle infestation is low (in line with the two scenarios of CRUISER OSR use for season 2014).

Examples of such counties are Shropshire, Buckinghamshire or Oxfordshire – these are counties that fall into low risk categories and can be debated and researched further to assess their suitability. This exclusion zone will become embedded into the 2014 stewardship programme to which the Processors, retailers and growers contract to. Any applications for use within the exclusion zone will be void and will not be granted, therefore treated seed will not be released.

Do let me know if the department has any additional questions of us at this stage.
